

West Street, c. 1940. Some of the shops down the right-hand side of the street have been destroyed. A man struts, hand in pocket, with his shopping bag. Is he contemplating a well-told tale the Bugle told? As the sun falls, shadows are cast. Lovely old cars line either side of him. There were all wearing dresses, the nearest to the camera wearing sunglasses too and to cross the road. All of this suggests that it is summer time. A bicycle, with the basket hanging over the handlebars, rests on the pavement. Their carefree post-war years did seem bicycles to be abundant and peddled when left unattended. Perhaps the bicycle owner the pub. Is the little boy darting towards the pub too soon? Has the lad been sent on his own orders to drag his father back home? (Fareham Museum Museum)

The Bugle and neighbouring shops, West Street, Fareham, 1940. (Fareham Museum Museum)

West Street, 2006. The area where the people are crossing the road in the earlier photograph is now pedestrianised and today a tree stands in place of the bollard and the 'keep left' sign. The Bugle Hotel still stands virtually unchanged but its name has been changed to the Brass Monkey. It is now a pub rather than a hotel. The signposts to the left of the old photograph pointing to Southington, Lee-on-Solent and Gosport on the A11 have been removed, because this street is now only one way to traffic coming into the town. The lovely old buildings on the right of the earlier photograph have been replaced by ghastly characterless post-war structures. How did the planners get away with that? (Tim Saunders)

A detail of the art nouveau windows that grace the Brass Monkey public house, 2006. The sign above the window still looks fresh and appealing. (Tim Saunders)
