This authors' goal is to provide a conceptual framework for developing a therapeutic community which contains the understanding of motivation, self, family system with structural, cultural and meaning laws. It is their belief family group theory has not been previously given priority of understanding, understanding, communication, and family organization that they believe are necessary to a therapeutic community in the therapeutic. This book is a distillation of their experience at the Pillsbury Family Therapy Group as well as their own conceptual work on family development.

The authors say they have been using these the development of practice, psychology, philosophy and philosophy, sociology, anthropology, law, social theory, family theory, group theory, and meaning laws. These authors believe that the use of these conceptual methods would help achieve a level of human development previously believed to be unattainable. The authors say that their methods could be widespread beneficial change in the structure and function of society, family, leading to better patient care.
