

The Quality of Drinking Water

AROUND THE WORLD

Before water is safe to drink, it first needs to be treated for germs, pollutants and parasites that can make you dangerously unwell. But how does the quality of drinking water differ around the world? Our map reveals each country's water quality (EPI) score as given by Yale University, indicating how safe the local drinking water is. A higher score means safer water.

Ten European countries (including the UK) score a perfect 100, meaning the local tap water is the safest in the world to drink. In contrast, many countries in Africa place at the most dangerous end of the scale.

METHODOLOGY: Based on each country's score on Yale University's Environmental Performance Index. The index assigns each country a score that rates the quality of local drinking water based on the number of age-standardized, disability-adjusted life-years lost per 100,000 persons (DALY) rate due to exposure to unsafe drinking water. Higher scores indicate safer drinking water.
