

Frieda Fromm-Reichmann's work. In her last unfinished paper given as a kind of epilogue—on loneliness—she shows the most of herself and weaves something of that mysterious sphere of human separation around herself that can be so frightening to some and so fruitful to others, those who know how to bridge the empty spaces between human beings.

It was the therapeutic art and skill of Frieda Fromm-Reichmann that enabled her to make contact where other therapists failed. Her papers (and book) on schizophrenia are witness to that curative rapport she was able to establish with her patients. Contact-anxiety and reactive hostility, because of an overwhelming dependency need, usually keep the schizophrenic patient in a very fragile transference relation.

Making use of her great theoretical knowledge of what was going on inside the schizophrenic patient, Fromm-Reichmann was able to lead them out of their impasse.

The first part of her book, in which the clear theoretician comes to the fore, is dedicated to the philosophy of mental disorder. The second part, on psychoanalysis and psychotherapy, describes the manifold aspects of the patient-doctor relationship. The third part, "on schizophrenia," contains the most important contributions Frieda Fromm-Reichmann has made to the understanding and therapy of this strange disease. Because of this part alone I would wish to see the book in the hands of all therapists. It tells us what intuition and personal dedication can do to bring a sick person out of his mental isolation. The fourth section of the book initiates us into the even more complicated problems of manic-depressives and their paradoxical self-defeating defenses. The last section, "on general psychiatric problems" gives, for instance, a penetrating view of the mother's role in the family group and the necessity for the therapist to be more aware of ecological influences in psychotherapy.

Through the whole book we find portrayed the historical development of a brilliant therapist who was intensely honest with herself. She did not see a great difference in mental functioning between the neurotic and the psychotic and all those supposedly normal people. In each patient she saw a struggling human being who in his quest for empathy and insight was asking the therapist to help him grow away from his anxieties and his often self-inflicted pains.
