Bresciani, Alberto Valdés, 2007-01-01 The importance of agricultural growth to poverty reduction is well known but the specific channels through which the poor can take advantage of growth require further research Bresciani and Valdés investigate four important channels rural labour markets farm incomes food prices and linkages to other economic sectors Part 1 looks at the synthesis and theoretical background and part 2 is country case studies Down to Earth Luc J.

Christiaensen, 2007 This book contributes to the debate about the role of agriculture in poverty reduction by addressing three sets of questions Does investing in agriculture enhance harm overall economic growth and if so under what conditions Do poor people tend to participate more less in growth in agriculture than in growth in other sectors and if so when If a focus on agriculture would tend to yield larger participation by the poor but slower overall growth which strategy would tend to have the largest payoff in terms of poverty reduction and under which conditions The Future of Small Farms for Poverty

Reduction and Growth Hazell, P.B.R., Poulton, Colin, Wiggins, Steve, Dorward, Andrew, 2007 The Role of Agriculture in Poverty Reduction Luc J. Christiaensen, Lionel Demery, Jesper Khl, 2006 The relative contribution of a sector to poverty reduction is shown to depend on its direct and indirect growth effects as well as its participation effect The paper assesses how these effects compare between agriculture and non agriculture by reviewing the literature and by analyzing cross country national accounts and poverty data from household surveys Special attention is given to Sub Saharan Africa While the direct growth effect of agriculture on poverty reduction is likely to be smaller than that of non agriculture though not because of inherently inferior productivity growth the indirect growth effect of agriculture through its linkages with

nonagriculture appears substantial and at least as large as the reverse feedback effect. The poor participate much more in growth in the agricultural sector especially in low income countries resulting in much larger poverty reduction impact. Together these findings support the overall premise that enhancing agricultural productivity is the critical entry point in designing effective poverty reduction strategies including in Sub Saharan Africa. Yet to maximize the poverty reducing effects the right agricultural technology and investments must be pursued underscoring the need for much more country specific analysis of the structure and institutional organization of the rural economy in designing poverty reduction strategies.

Beyond Food Production Fabrizio Bresciani, Alberto Valdés, 2007-01-01. The importance of agricultural growth to poverty reduction is well known but the specific channels through which the poor can take advantage of growth require further research. This publication takes on this challenge investigating four important channels: rural labor markets, farm incomes, food prices and linkages to other economic sectors. Using six developing country cases: Chile, Mexico, India, Indonesia, Ghana, South Africa, this study elucidates the mechanisms linking agriculture growth to economic development and the wellbeing of the poor. The evidence shows that governments should view the sector's contribution in wider terms recognizing both its interaction with other economic sectors and that labor markets and trade policies can play a critical role in mediating agriculture's impact on poor households' incomes. To achieve effective rural poverty strategies the book calls for a broad economy wide perspective on the role of agriculture in the overall growth process. Publisher's description

Impacts of agricultural investments on growth and poverty: A review of literature Martin, Will, 2021-11-24. Agricultural development is crucial in developing countries and particularly in the poorest countries where it accounts for large shares of employment and income and whose poverty is due simply to having a large share of the workforce in low productivity agriculture. Raising productivity in agriculture is critically important for development as is smoothly moving workers out of agriculture into more productive employment in other sectors. Raising agricultural productivity helps both to raise incomes and to reduce poverty both by raising the incomes of poor people working in agriculture and by lowering the prices of foods that make up a disproportionately large share of the expenditures of poor people. In small and open economies the increase in profitability of agriculture following improvements in productivity might tend to retain or even attract workers into agriculture. By contrast at a global level or at national level when policy focusses on self sufficiency improvements in agricultural productivity will free up labor for employment in other sectors. Incomes are generally much higher in non agricultural work in developing countries more than double those in agriculture after careful adjustment for key differences. This raises the possibility of a double dividend from structural transformation as workers move into higher productivity activities. A key question for development policy is whether it is enough to simply evaluate the gains from higher productivity within agriculture or whether potential benefits from structural change be included as well. This paper examines the arguments on this question. It concludes that these dividends may be substantial but whether they are or not depends on the source of the initial differences in productivity and on the direction of movement when agricultural productivity rises If it results from policy barriers such as restrictions on the transfer of farmland or requirements for residence permits in urban areas there are likely to be substantial welfare gains when labor moves out of agriculture They may also be substantial if urban wages are artificially high and attract substantial numbers of job waiters into unemployment However these gains may be illusory if the income gaps arise primarily from differences in skills or from reluctance to move created by asset fixity

The Role of Agriculture in Development Xinshen Diao, Hazell, P.B.R., Resnick, Danielle, Thurlow, James, 2007 Changes in the global environment have led some to question whether the conventional wisdom on the role of agriculture in economic development is still relevant to Africa today This report critically examines the literature on this issue taking both the conventional and skeptical views into account It complements this review with case studies of five African countries The findings indicate that agricultural growth will play an essential role in promoting overall economic growth and reducing poverty in most of Africa s agrarian based economies This holds true even for countries that have the potential for industrial growth driven by natural resources The results also show that only smallholder food staple and livestock production can generate broadbased agricultural growth By demonstrating that Africa s agricultural and food subsector cannot be bypassed this report contributes to an important ongoing debate in development studies
