Decomposing Social Indicators Using Distributional Data Benu Bidani, Martin Ravallion, 1995 Political Analysis and Statistical Applications for Social Policy Research Ryan Thomas Moore, 2008 This thesis presents three independent essays contributing to political science research in American social policy Each essay addresses a significant substantive question regarding democratic institutions and their policy outputs and provides a methodological solution to a quantitative political data problem The first essay examines electoral support for old age pensions in the US states between 1914 and 1956 Using data from twelve states this essay tests and finds evidence contrary to important models of the political economy of welfare state development This analysis demonstrates the impact of asymmetric elite partisan cues which structure voter choices more strongly than do individual economic interests Little individual level survey data exists so inferences are required from aggregate data Original software is provided to implement methods appropriate for such data

World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators II Charles Lewis Taylor, 1970 Contains 2 sets of raw data one containing information used to construct aggregate measure of fractionalization and concentration the other containing data used to construct measures of inequality The first set of data use these variables city populations language ethnic group export commodities distribution of votes etc The second uses variables such as distributions of farms acreage labor forces and gross domestic product Codebook Addendum Charles Lewis Taylor, 1981
