Agricultural Productivity and Producer Behavior Wolfram Schlenker, 2019-11-13 Agricultural yields have increased steadily in the last half century particularly since the Green Revolution At the same time inflation adjusted agricultural commodity prices have been trending downward as increases in supply outpace the growth of demand Recent severe weather events biofuel mandates and a switch toward a more meat heavy diet in emerging economies have nevertheless boosted commodity prices Whether this is a temporary jump or the beginning of a longer term trend is an open question Agricultural Productivity and Producer Behavior examines the factors contributing to the remarkably steady increase in global yields and assesses whether yield growth can continue This research also considers whether agricultural productivity growth has been and will be associated with significant environmental externalities Among the topics studied are genetically modified crops changing climatic factors farm production responses to government regulations including crop insurance transport subsidies and electricity subsidies for groundwater extraction and the role of specific farm practices such as crop diversification disease management and water saving methods This research provides new evidence that technological as well as policy choices influence agricultural productivity
