Olivola,Eldar Shafir,2018 Previous research has found that people generally contribute more to a charitable or collective cause when they expect to endure pain and exert effort for that cause Olivola see also Olivola 2010 That is the prospect of their own pain and effort led them to donate more to the cause a phenomenon called the martyrdom effect Olivola Shafir 2013 This paper shows that the martyrdom effect extends beyond the self Enduring pain and effort for a charitable cause also motivates others to contribute more to that cause Across five experiments we test this hypothesis consider alternative accounts and examine the underlying mechanism The martyrdom effect extended to others has important implications for designing successful charity fundraisers Common sense and many theories of human behavior assume that people prefer that others especially close others not endure pain and effort and would therefore prescribe making the fundraising experience as easy and enjoyable for people as possible in order to get their friends family and colleagues to donate However our results suggest that people are more not less willing to sponsor a close other s fundraising when the fundraising process is painful and effortful Therefore making a person s fundraising experience challenging is often the best way to attract donations whereas making the experience easy and enjoyable is likely to backfire in many cases
