This work by Karl Julius Reubke embodies labours of experience and reflection spanning almost 20 years It is rich with many kinds of detail but above all Reubke s work accomplishes something the late German philosopher Hans Georg Gadamer called a Horizontverschmelzung a merging of horizons in service of an act of understanding Reubke a German himself a former chemist a follower of Rudolph Steiner a self taught Sanskrit scholar and translator of ancient texts sympathetically merges those horizons with an equally complex set of horizons arising from India the post colonial search for a coherent tradition in one of the oldest civilizations the emergence of early modern spiritual and nationalist thinking the complex challenges posed by Gandhi s ethico spiritual vision and then finally from the contemporary India driven and riven by the forces of globalization the horizon of a civil social movement inspired by Gandhi and Vinobha namely Ekta Parishad Reubke describes this movement inspired and led by PV Rajagopal from the inside with a personal touch and a uncannily reflective eye All of this is an accomplishment of some note and worthy of our attention especially as we now turn to confront how we as people of the planet will face the ecological disaster our way of living has created This too is a task of comprehension which Hannah Arendt described as the work of the unpremeditated facing up to and resisting of reality whatever it may be
