School of English Literature, Language and Linguistics,2012 The diverse and potentially highly nuanced topographical vocabulary used in English place names constitutes a fruitful area of research within the fields of semantics and lexicology as well as onomastics It has been observed in previous studies Gelling 1984 Gelling and Cole 2000 that topographical terms are used in major settlement names of Old English OE origin consistently of landscape features of a particular type often with highly specialised meanings for instance OE d n of a flat topped hill and OE h h of a heel shaped one This observation which has been termed the Gelling hypothesis is today regarded as valid for most if not all parts of England In this thesis I investigate the meanings and uses of hill terms that is place name elements referring to hill features in the place names of Northumberland and County Durham with special reference to previous work by Gelling and Cole I argue that the Gelling hypothesis is valid in general in the study area but also that the relationship between the topographical terms and the landscape features to which they refer is often not as straightforward as the hypothesis predicts I extend the investigation to names of Middle English and Modern English origin identifying specialised uses which suggest that the contrast in precision between the OE and later hill terms is not as stark as the hypothesis seems to predict I also examine the collocations of the commonest hill terms finding typical collocates and collocation patterns This thesis is based on an electronic corpus containing all relevant names found on current OS Landranger 1 50 000 maps the total number of names in the corpus is 2 227 The discussion of the meanings of the hill terms is based on a detailed analysis of a representative sample of topographical sites through map work and field work based on the methodological frameworks developed by Gelling and Cole with the introduction of consistent and clearly defined terminology which allows for more objective analysis
