Instructions to the rater

The rating should be based on a flexible clinical interview where the subject is initially encouraged to describe in his own words, and in as much detail as possible, the symptoms that are relevant to him. The interviewer should then decide which items in the scale have not been fully covered and phrase questions in as broad and neutral manner as possible to allow the subject to elaborate these areas. If this is not sufficient for the rating, more specific questions may be needed. The first interview is a series intended to measure change in its own nature a training session for both the rater and the subject. It may therefore be useful to let the interview open a much longer time span than will eventually be rated, to make sure that the subject fully understands the questions and to let the rater familiarize himself with the subject's history. This will make it easier for the rater to phrase the pertinent questions in later interviews. We have found it useful and would recommend that a separate sheet is used for each new rating.
