

surveying the site

The survey is the first step of the design process. First, I take 'running measurements' with the tape laid out right across and down the garden. All appropriate details and features are marked down, including the building itself, position of doors and windows, drains and changes of level. Check soil type, the boundary materials and existing planting, note good or bad views, the direction of a prevailing wind and the orientation of the garden.

In doing this, you will almost certainly start to get a real feeling of the plot – the sunny and shady areas, how you move around the space, the potential for a particular feature or a focal point. This will shape your thinking about how to develop the garden.
