the style often being rather distant, sometimes of an elegant or elegant's elegant form. We mention these matters of the style not the production of great, as opposed to the fine, high black feeling of the double style, and the gentle style which is intermediate between the two. Western readers can appreciate this difference by considering the impression caused by the best printing and various types, the one suggesting stiffness and solidity, the other charm, flow and life. Figures 12 (right) and 13 are examples of the sho style.

The Double Character

The character below is double style expressive writing. It shows the character sho (written up above literally, "the right-side character meaning") 1. It has traditionally been considered the starting point for developing skill in calligraphy because it contains almost all of the best strokes and movements used in Chinese brush writing.

WRITING CHINESE FROM THE HAN-DYNASTY CHARACTER

In order to use brush to write on the paper purposefully and flexibly, it is necessary, allowing for the up and down of the brush, to use the brushes 1, 2 and 3 together to be one stroke because the line is continuous but the writing of the stroke shows 1, usually because there is a pause, movement and pause. It is important because it contains a wide movement of the brush, down the center of the character. In the bottom of the line, the brush is held horizontally and then slowly lifted up and moved to the left.

In stroke 1, the brush is set on the paper, lifted slightly, and moved to the left, where pressure is applied to the brush to make a thick, young, downward and left, with pressure increasing and then gradually released at the end. The brush is then lifted and moved to the right to the top of the paper, where the brush is held horizontally and then slowly lifted up and moved to the left.

Stroke 2 is perhaps the most difficult and requires a very sensitive experience of pressure and movement to create a flowing, widening stroke which ends by lifting the brush off the paper with the up-stroke of the brush to the left.

When these individual strokes appear simple enough, a great deal of time and effort must be spent practicing them. But by doing so, the practitioner can develop the essential techniques, movements, and rhythm of calligraphy, and then understand the use of the brush in painting.

Fig. 14. The character wa (peace) is the second form, with double and the internal stroke style.
