1. Introduction<sup>1</sup>

Language documentation, also known as documentary linguistics, is the sub-field of linguistics that deals with creating multi-purpose records of languages through audio and video recording of speakers and signers, and annotation, translation, preservation and distribution of the resulting materials. It shows by its nature multi-disciplinarity (see Section 6.7) and draws on theoretical concepts and methods from linguistics, ethnography, folklore studies, psychology, information and library science, archiving and museum studies, digital humanities, media and recording arts, pedagogy, ethics, and other research areas. Its major goal is the creation of well-organized long-lasting corpora that can be used for a variety of purposes, including theoretical research and practical needs such as language and cultural revitalization (see Section 9). Another prominent feature is attention to the rights and desires of language speakers and communities and collaboration with them (see Section 7.2) in the recording, analysis, archiving, dissemination and support of their own languages. The term “language documentation” historically has been used in Linguistics to refer to the creation of grammars, dictionaries and text collections for undescribed languages; however works defining language documentation as a distinct sub-field of Linguistics emerged around 1995 as a response to the crisis facing the world’s endangered languages, about half of which could disappear in the 21st century, and the urgent need to record and analyse languages and speakers’ linguistic knowledge while they continue to be spoken, and to work with communities on supporting threatened languages before opportunities to do so become reduced. It was also prompted by developments in information, media, communication, and archiving technologies which make possible the collection, analysis, preservation and dissemination of documentary records in ways which were not feasible previously. It was also facilitated by large levels of research funding support from three main sources: the DOBES (Documentation of Endangered Languages) program sponsored by Volkswagen Foundation in Germany (2000-2013), the Endangered Languages Documentation Programme (ELDP) supported by Arcadia Trust in the United Kingdom (2002-2016), and the Documenting Endangered Languages (DEL) interagency initiative of the United States National Science Foundation and the National Endowment of the Humanities (2005 onwards). Language documentation concerns itself with principles and methods for the recording and analysis of primary language and cultural materials, and metadata about them, in ways that are transparent and accountable, and that can be archived and disseminated for
