

On Positive Liberty

- * American conservatism is partially rooted in our conceptions of liberty. Positive freedoms are more progressive and favorable than negative freedoms. Positive liberties are often discussed in the modern context in relation to emerging human rights concerns and international law at the global level. Positive liberty simply conceived is the freedom to do or to act. They are positive in the sense that government permits rather than protects individuals to be the "master" of their own lives (Berlin 1970: 131).
- * The manifestation of this type of liberty is most commonly seen in the political sphere where the individual will take a greater role in determining the future of the society in which they live. If we are talking about a more ideal-type form of democracy (i.e. 'rule of the people'), then positive liberties are the freedoms that would allow for the greatest expression of individual voice, encourage the highest levels of respect for human dignity (by allowing people to make important decisions), and ensure a more communal and less hierarchical form of decision-making. They are purely more democratic than any negative freedom that the government could offer.
