Jones, 2014-06-01 Recently with the number of students from higher education and K 12 settings committing suicide it is apparent that homophobia and homophobic bullying are tremendous problems in our schools and universities However educators are unclear about an appropriate process for addressing these challenges In this book Jones postulates that we must begin exploring the culture of educational environments as they relate to sexual difference in order to begin conceptualizing ways in which we may begin to address homophobia and heteronormativity To that end this book addresses how educators at all levels must begin examining how their concepts about different sexual identities are normalized through socializing processes and schooling In doing so this book examines how individuals construct meanings about homophobia and hate language through contextual oppositions

how educational environments maintain a false tolerance when claiming to be tolerant of different sexual identities how a hierarchy of hate language exists in educational environments among other issues related to creating safe places for all students In essence the book attempts to unnormalize society's constructions of sexual identity by deconstructing the social norms
