In eighteenth-century England, the confectioner was one of the more highly regarded tradesmen involved in the preparation of food. His skills were more elevated than those of a mere cook or baker, and if he was successful in his craft, he could earn not only an impressive income but also a respectable social standing. Naturally, some confectioners found employment in the manors of the aristocracy. Others ran their own shops in the growing cities and large towns and sold a remarkable variety of sweetmeats, biscuits, and desserts, as well as other elaborate table furnishings necessary for the lavish entertainments of the era. Among the early literary works describing this burgeoning field was Edward Lambert's The Art of the Confectionary, published in London in 1761. Reprinted here in its original text are Lambert's eighteenth-century methods for preserving fruits and making a variety of cakes, biscuits, pastes, jellies, and others. Please note that these recipes may be of more historical interest as opposed to being practically useful and relevant to the modern reader.
