Beyond The Black River Robert E. Howard, 2021-01-01 The stillness of the forest trail was so primeval that the tread of a soft-booted foot was a startling disturbance At least it seemed so to the ears of the wayfarer though he was moving along the path with the caution that must be practised by any man who ventures beyond Thunder River He was a young man of medium height with an open countenance and a mop of tousled tawny hair unconfined by cap or helmet His garb was common enough for that country a coarse tunic belted at the waist short leather breeches beneath and soft buckskin boots that came short of the knee A knife hilt jutted from one boot-top The broad leather belt supported a short heavy sword and a buckskin pouch There was no perturbation in the wide eyes that scanned the green walls which fringed the trail Though not tall he was well built and the arms that the short wide sleeves of the tunic left bare were thick with corded muscle
