

a significant weakness of this article is that is focused on a particular age group. This is why it can be said that this findings cannot be implemented to the general populations. It is to mention that the finding of this article could be used in the early childhood education as it helps in providing a deep insight the nature of old people and why they value higher value items. Educators could implement the findings of this article in the process of education. For example, the older adults could give more priority on the information and details that one has to recall and remember first in the situation of self-learning. As the aging decline, the overall memory of an individual, but the strategy of the self-regulated learning could help in remembering the key information and points.

The authors Herrmann et al. (2013) in this article have investigated on how children of diverse age range i.e., from 3, 4 and 7 years children's reason regarding the biological and non-biological mechanisms of change. The main focus on this study on analysing the perceptions of children towards change in biological and non-biological aspects of the world. The research team of this research study, Herrmann, French, DeHart and Rosengren are of the aim for examining whether reasoning of children regarding life-span change as a biological process is affected by the change level. With the same, they also examined how the reasoning of children regarding the types of changes are influenced by their age and development of their knowledge. The main strength of this study is that it is experimental research. The article started with providing a brief review of the modern perspectives on the concept of psychological essentialism. A total of two studies were conducted for examining the impact
