Denatured Enzymes ROR = 1000 : TIME

When the active site changes shape the enzyme is denatured and can no longer be used. The combination of factors is:

- pH - all have an optimum pH
- Temp - all have an optimum temp
- Substrate - all have an optimum substrate concentration
- Enzyme - all have an optimum enzyme concentration

Enzymes are more likely to react with substrates if they have the same shape as the active site. If they don't, they will be left.

Proteins, lipids and some carbohydrates are big molecules so organisms need to break them down so we can use them for growth & other life processes, we break them down using digestive enzymes which break them down into smaller, soluble molecules that can easily pass through the digestive system wall.

Carbohydrases convert carbohydrates into sugars
 Proteases convert proteins into amino acids
 Lipases convert lipids into glycerol & fatty acids (each having)

ENZYME SPECIFICITY

- Lock & Key hypothesis Enzyme
- Substrate = molecule changed in reaction
- Active site = part where substrate binds
- Enzymes only work with one substrate
- They have a high specificity

- Carbohydrates can be made by joining together simple sugars
- Proteins are made by joining amino acids
- Lipids are made by joining fatty acids & glycerol
