Carretta,2008 Over the past decade the U S military has conducted several studies to evaluate determinants of enlisted air traffic controller ATC performance Research has focused on validation of the Armed Services Vocational Aptitude Battery ASVAB and has shown it to be a good predictor of training performance Despite these efforts enlisted ATC training and post training attrition is higher than desirable prompting interest in alternate selection methods to augment current procedures The current study examined the utility of the FAA Air Traffic Selection and Training AT SAT battery for incrementing the predictiveness of the ASVAB versus several enlisted ATC training criteria Subjects were 448 USAF enlisted ATC students who were administered the ASVAB and FAA AT SAT subtests and subsequently graduated or were eliminated from apprentice level training Training criteria were a dichotomous graduation elimination training score average ATC fundamentals course score and FAA certified tower operator test score Results confirmed the predictive validity of the ASVAB and showed that one of the AT SAT subtests resembling a low fidelity ATC work sample significantly improved prediction of training performance beyond the ASVAB alone Results suggest training attrition could be reduced by raising the current ASVAB minimum qualifying score However this approach may make it difficult to identify sufficient numbers of trainees and lead to adverse impact Although the AT SAT ATC work sample subtest showed incremental validity to the ASVAB its length 95 minutes may be problematic in operational testing Recommendations are made for additional studies to address issues affecting operational implementation P i School and Job Validation of Selection Measures for Air Traffic Control Training Leland D.
