PART I

I. THE NATURE OF CHILDHOOD AND THE CLINICAL SERVICES NEEDED TO DEAL WITH THE PROBLEMS OF THIS PERIOD.

Child Psychiatry is a development within the field of general psychiatry of comparatively recent origin. With the shift of major emphasis from the laboratory to the study of man himself, dynamic psychiatry began. In this early period, the symptoms and character traits of adult patients were correlated with memories of early interpersonal experiences. This synthesis resulted in formulations of theories regarding child development. But attempting to understand the child out of such retrospective material, useful as it was for a dynamic reconstruction of adult problems, was unsatisfactory because it kept the focus on adulthood and not on childhood as an important period in itself. This finally made it desirable to study the child at first hand. The major motive for this direct approach was the hope of wholesale prevention of difficulties in later life, but it soon became evident that such a broad goal, although understandable as an ideal, was unattainable in practice. Furthermore, it was found that focusing attention mainly on potential difficulties of the future tended to obstruct therapeutic efforts in the present. The prophylactic objectives of mental hygiene thus recede as immediate goals to be realized by clinical attention to the problems of childhood. Clarity on the important differences between clinical and mental hygiene objectives is resulting in more effective efforts in each, in fulfilling their different objectives.

The therapeutic needs of disturbed children stimulated further growth in the field of child psychiatry. As knowledge accumulated out of direct observation by psychiatrists, child analysts, social workers, psychologists and pediatricians, there emerged a better understanding of the laws of psychological growth and development. The child began to be thought of as a child and not as a miniature adult. He was seen to be an individual whose thoughts, feelings, relationships and means of expression differ from those of adults. The field of child psychiatry took shape out of the recognition of these differences and out of the needs to develop clinical skills to help children with emotional disturbances.

Many divergences in methodology and clinical practices have emerged as the field of child psychiatry developed into a recognized clinical specialty. Underlying these differences in theory and practice, certain basic principles have been accepted generally in the understanding of personality development. First there is common agreement in stressing the importance of early stages of development in shaping the personality; and, second, that an important dynamic in personality development is contained in the interaction between biological and cultural forces. This group agreed that certain differences in emphasis should be included in this statement.

One viewpoint is expressed in the genetic dynamic concepts of psychoanalysis. Personality development is a historical continuum as the biological forces interact with forces of the cultural setting in which the child develops as an individual. Successive stages are understood in their relation to preceding ones. Early experiences, as well as the processes elaborating them, continue to exert their influence without being available to conscious recall or conscious perception.

Biological forces express the vitality of the organism (Id). They are manifested in the individual's needs for intake, for elimination and retention, for muscular and sensory activity. These instinctual needs are perceived as urges to discharge tension through the exercise of physiological functions. By maintaining homeostatic balance, gratification of instinctual needs helps to preserve the biological integrity of the organism.

Instinctual tendencies follow the general principle of growth, proceeding from simple to higher forms of integration and differentiation. In the course of growth, physiological functions assume supremacy in typical sequence. While the maturational sequence is common to the entire species, individuals vary in the intensity of their needs and in the rate and rhythm of growth.

Compared to the newborn of other species, the human infant is insufficiently equipped to survive by inborn automatic reflexes alone. His physiological functions have to be perfected before they can adequately serve his vital needs. The ministrations of others is essential for his survival. Protection, stimulation and vital supplies must be provided in the care he receives. In fulfilling the functions of maternal care, the mother mediates between the infant and the outer world. After the symbiotic uterine existence, the mother as the source of gratification, protection and limitation becomes the first representative of external reality.

While the newborn requires immediate gratification of his instinctual needs, physiological growth increases his tolerance for inner tension and external stimulation. The benign impact of a predictable reality on the maturing organism leads to the structuralization of the initially undifferentiated discharge-movements. Perception, motility and anticipation of environmental response permit the individual to scan increasing sectors of the external world in terms of his instinctual needs. Thus maturational processes and environmental direction (specifically, the shaping of instinctual tendencies through maternal care), lead to the establishment of the psychological functions of the ego, which mediates between inner need and external world.

Weizman,R. Weizman,2012-12-06 The idea for this book developed during the course of several discussions among the editors while we were working together as staff scientists in the laboratories of the Clinical Neuro science Branch of the National Institute of Mental Health It was a happy coincidence that the three of us child psychiatrists with predominantly clinical interests selected a collaborative bench research project involving neurotransmitter receptor characterization and regulation We appreciated the relevance of our work to child psychiatry and wished for a forum to share the excitement we enjoyed in the laboratory with our clinical colleagues Moreover it seemed to us that much of the pharmacological research in child psychiatry proceeded on an empirical basis often without a compelling neurochemical rationale This could reflect the paucity of neurochemical data that exists in child psychiatry and the very limited understanding of the pathophysiology in most psychiatric disorders that occur in childhood Also we bemoaned the fact that there was a virtual absence of meaningful interchange between clinical investigators in child psychiatry and their colleagues in the neurosciences We believed that an edited book appealing to clinicians and basic scientists could serve as an initial effort to foster interchange between them The editors wish to emphasize that this book is viewed as only a beginning in the process of interchange that must take place

Principles and Practice of Child Psychiatry Stella Chess, Mahin Hassibi, 2013-06-29 Stella Chess s many admirers throughout the world have long looked forward to the day when she would produce her own textbook of child psychiatry They will not be disappointed in this thoughtful and perceptive account of the principles and practices of the subject written in collaboration with Dr Hassibi It has all the hallmarks we have come to recognize as distinctive of the Chess approach to child psychiatry gentle yet subtle and penetrating always appreciative of the feelings and concerns of both the children and their parents well informed and critically aware of research findings but far from overawed by the contributions of science and above all immensely practical Anyone who wants to know how one of the world s outstanding clinicians appraises what child psychiatry has to offer could do no better than to read this book Child psychiatry differs from general psychiatry in being concerned with a developing organism and it is entirely appropriate that the book begins with an account of child development and of the principal theories put forward to explain it Chess and Hassibi recognize the importance of theory in organizing ideas and in suggesting explanations but they remain skeptical of how far existing theories do in fact account for the outstanding issues in development They note the limitations of all theories in explaining how development takes place and why individual differences occur in the way they do

In-patient Child Psychiatry Jonathan Green, Brian Jacobs, 2013-04-15 Essential Reading for clinicians managers and researchers in child psychiatry this authoritative book provides accessible coverage of essential theory as well as clear practical guidance to inpatient child psychiatric treatment This method of treatment has fallen out of fashion in recent years in favour of community based care but remains a useful setting for treating more seriously ill patients Bringing together contributions from across the profession this book covers the state of the art in current clinical treatment and sets a bold new agenda for the future arguing that inpatient child psychiatric units retain great potential for creative effective relevant treatment

Comprehensive Handbook of Psychopathology Henry E. Adams,2013-12-18 The major purpose of this handbook is to provide a comprehensive review of current clinical descriptions research and theories of psychopathology Descrip tive psychopathology is a field that is the foundation of clinical practice and re search in clinical psychology psychiatry psychiatric social work psychiatric nursing and allied professions in mental health Psychopathology is often per ceived as a stepchild of the more glamorous areas of diagnosis or assessment and therapy or behavioral change Nevertheless it is doubtful that any meaningful advancements in these areas will occur until there is a thorough understanding of the behavioral disorders The purpose of the present project was to devise a handbook that covered both general and specific topics in psychopathology and that would be useful to re searchers practitioners and graduate or other advanced students in the mental health professions In order to implement this plan we selected very carefully colleagues whom we respect for their expertise in particular fields These include both clinicians and researchers with outstanding national reputations as well as more junior behavioral scientists and clinicians who in our opinion will achieve similar recognition in the future The chapters in this book lead us to believe that we have chosen wisely We would like to express our appreciation to these authors for their outstanding contributions and cooperation

Speech and Communication Problems in Psychiatry, 2013-12-20 This volume represents a painstaking and scholarly introduction to the management of children and adults who have problems of communication related to or in addition to mental disorder It is a relatively unexplored field having received scant attention until recent years but the quality of the work included here gives a clear indication that the area should move from the periphery into a main stream position in the education and practice of speech therapists Although all students in training receive some teaching in the area of psychiatry it tends to be limited to a brief consideration of the role of the psychiatrist and clinical psychologist very rarely the speech therapist It has been proposed that the education of the speech therapist who intends to enter this difficult but rewarding field should be developed at post graduate level and there are strong arguments given in this volume to support the idea Claims that the field is neglected during initial training are however well founded and this volume should alert those responsible for the education of speech therapists to this deficiency
