other words by now we cannot be sure that Acerola understood that the invasions and contentions of the 19th century did not happen in the same terms motivations and conditions which outline many events that we witness nowadays This lecture is about Acerola s speech and the learning questions it arises can we assert that Acerola really learned the teacher s lesson What criteria should we employ to say that he learned it or not If he only had repeated the teacher s words this could mean learning To what extent the interference of his previous knowledge about social problems in Rio over those historical facts ceases to be learning and starts to be free interpretation And as to the map which was a didactic artefact for both the teacher and Acerola is it the same object in both narratives or could it be respectively a map of Western world and afterwards a map of Rio de Janeiro Or could it be a third thing whose existence lasted only during the time that Acerola told his version of the story Whatever the answers we offer to these questions they do not belie the fact that Acerola actively interacted not only with the contents expressed by the teacher in such a way to deeply alter them but he also changed the object around which the lesson was taught the map Therefore our answers must take into account his important agentic actions over the classroom setting and the fact that these actions are closely related to his degree of learning To argue about these issues this lecture aims to present the theoretical basis for observing learning as an agentic accomplishment based on a two way affectment between the learner and the environment and as an adaptive reorganization of a complex system Hutchins 1995 p 289 As we define this theoretical basis we need to raise three important criteria in order to not only discuss issues brought up on the observation of Acerola s actions in the classroom but also establish how we can adjust this concept of learning to institutional terms what is the view of cognition which allows us to recognize learning not only as internalization of concepts but also an action over the environment what is the constitution of the learning environment which allows this twofold relationship through which means it is possible to observe the didactic artifacts found in this environment and how they contribute and are representative for learning as a cognitive action of constitutive interchange between person and environment This three criteria lead us to observe cognition in a distributed fashion in order to postulate that the use of the environment in the cognitive elaboration does enhances cognitive action through the access to more resources available than the neural apparatus
