Summary. Soil micromorphology consists of the integrated use of various microscopic techniques for studying the arrangement and the nature of components that form sediments and soils. The power of this analysis in archaeology is to provide key information which can discriminate the sedimentary signatures diagnostic of human-related activities from those resulting from natural phenomena.

Soil micromorphology has become popular in the last decade in archaeology, although the potential of the microscopic approach has been well known for more than fifty years, due to the recent increase in interest in site formation processes. This type of analysis can be used to achieve a detailed environmental reconstruction of human palaeolandscapes or to identify the various kinds of domestic and specialised activities which are involved in the formation of living floors and of anthropogenic structures.

The future progress of soil micromorphology in archaeology requires us to enrich our knowledge of the sedimentary dynamics of cultural processes and to increase the number of well-trained scientists in this new field of investigation. A better integration of the analysis at the microscopic scale with the field perception should help to improve the characterisation of site formation processes whilst the excavation is taking place.

1. Introduction

In archaeology, the study of sediments and soils has been shown to be an essential component of environmental reconstruction which may concern either palaeolandscapes and human impact at a regional scale, or site formation processes ruled by both natural factors and human activities (Butzer
