David S. Miall, for ENGL 350: Romantic Texts

This assembly of references collects some of the readings I have found helpful -- it is not intended to be representative, and is far from complete. After each citation I provide a short abstract and an illustrative quotation, which is intended to pique your interest in going to read the article as a whole.

Frankenstein 1818, ed. Marilyn Butler (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994).

Butler's introduction reviews the intellectual context and emotional stresses of Mary Shelley's life that appear to have influenced her novel. It is suggested that the science of the novel reflects a contemporary dispute among biologists, in particular between Abernethy and Lawrence (who acted as Percy Shelley's physician), whether life is to be explained on vitalist or mechanical principles. Butler argues that Shelley's revisions to the novel for its 1831 publication reflect her need to play down the mechanistic view which fell into disrepute during the 1820s. An account hostile to the mechanistic view is reprinted from a Quarterly Review article of 1819 in an Appendix. Also discussed are the ghost stories read at the Villa Diodati in 1816, the education of the monster, and Frankenstein's "parenting."

Mary and Percy Shelley, Lawrence's friends, were living near London in that March of 1816, when Lawrence's materialist case against spiritualized vitalism was first sketched out. It would not be surprising, then, if Mary's contribution to the ghost-story competition to some degree acts out the debate between Abernethy and Lawrence, in a form close enough for those who knew the debate to recognize. Frankenstein the blundering experimenter, still working with superseded notions, shadows the intellectual position of Abernethy, who proposes that the superadded life-element is analogous to electricity. Lawrence's sceptical commentary on that position finds its echo in Mary Shelley's equally detached, serio-comic representation . . . (p. xxi)

Frankenstein 1818, ed. D. L. Macdonald & Kathleen Scherf (Peterborough: Broadview Press, 1994).

The Introduction reviews the influences on the book and its publication history in four sections: The Education of Mary Shelley (in particular her reading of Godwin and Wollstonecraft), the Education of Victor Frankenstein (discussion of Darwin and Davy), the Education of the Monster, and the Evolution of the Novel. An Appendix provides extracts from Godwin, Wollstonecraft, Darwin, Davy, and from the books read by the
