The main focus of the study is foreign direct investment by German multinational companies. A range of methods including econometric studies, survey based analysis and detailed discussions of published statistics are used to assess the implications for the German economy and the results in host countries of foreign investment. Consideration is also given to FDI by Swedish multinational corporations as well as to the role national and supranational institutions can play in stimulating FDI. Although FDI often raises fears for employment and growth, it is an effective way of transferring techniques, processes and products into new markets. Firm specific assets transferred in this way can raise productivity in the host country without sacrificing jobs in the home country
