Objective: This study was undertaken to evaluate the Council on Resident Education in Obstetrics and Gynecology (CREOG) In-Training Examination scores for significant trends.

Study design: The percent-correct scores for each of the 6 published examination objectives from 7 consecutive years were analyzed. The data set was analyzed by multivariate analysis of variance using gender, examination year, and postgraduate year as categorical variables, and each year was analyzed separately by gender and postgraduate year. Scores of residents who took the examination for 4 consecutive years were analyzed by using repeated measures analysis of covariance.

Results: Variation by examination year appeared random, although scores monotonically increased with postgraduate year for all objectives and all years. The mean relative scores of women were higher than men on the primary/preventive care objective, but the reverse was true for the general considerations objective.

Conclusion: The CREOG In-Training Examination appears to be a dependable measure of residents' improvement in cognitive knowledge.

An accurate assessment of residents' competence in medical knowledge is a program requirement of the Accreditation Council for Graduate Medical Education (ACGME).¹ Since 1970, the Council on Resident Education in Obstetrics and Gynecology (CREOG) has developed an annual in-training examination to assist US residency programs assess cognitive knowledge.² The executive summary provided to program directors states: "In-training examinations are designed to provide feedback on progress for the resident and the training program." The examination also serves as a tool to evaluate a program's strengths and weaknesses, and to reflect the profession's sense of the knowledge that residents should acquire before graduation. The in-training examination has provided useful feedback to residents and program directors.^{3–6}
