Abstract

Drawing on interviews with clinical and university-based teacher educators and administrators, the authors explore the challenges of building and sustaining collaborative university/school partnerships. Using the concept of “communities of practice” (Communities of practice: learning, meaning, and identity, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK, 1998), the authors describe how clinical and university-based teacher educators share a set of assumptions about their respective roles—described as a form of “collusion”—that confirms status differences as well as the value of transmissive models of teaching. These assumptions undermine the goal of collaboration. The authors argue that the process involved in forming university/school partnerships needs to be understood less as an administrative and motivational problem than a question of identity formation and of relationship building.

1. Introduction

For well over a decade creation of University/Public School Partnerships or Professional Development Schools has been a centerpiece of the effort to improve teacher education (Holmes Group, 1986), what Robinson and Darling-Hammond (1994) described as an “imperative of professional responsibility in education” (p. 217). It is now generally recognized that quality teacher education requires not only improved practicum sites but a fundamental rethinking of teacher education practice. What is needed, as Goodlad (1994) has said, is the “simultaneous renewal” of both schools and teacher education practice (p. 123). In pursuit of simultaneous renewal new relationships between teacher education institutions and the schools have been created and new faculty roles have emerged.

In Tomorrow's Schools of Education (1995) the Holmes Group outlined what it thought were some of the needed changes in faculty roles and responsibilities and called for the creation of “clinical professorships.” Clinical professors would come from among “the ranks of distinguished [school] practitioners.” Such faculty

Liberalism holds that individual freedom can be realized under capitalism Classical liberalism tends to focus on excessive state interference as the primary threat to freedom More recent theorists however recognize that capitalism left to itself would be characterized by mass social ills and argue that state intervention is necessary to guarantee individual freedom This book is a Marxist critique of liberalism Prabhat Patnaik demonstrates that liberalism and Marxism provide vastly differing accounts of individual freedom and the forces that restrict it In the Marxist view people contrary to appearances lack real agency under capitalism Competition coerces individuals to act according to the impersonal logic of capitalism making them mere instruments of the system In this way capitalism creates universal alienation and true individual freedom is possible only through overcoming it Patnaik argues that socialism can secure individual agency in both economic and political spheres though actually existing socialism has failed in this respect He also considers what a socialist society should look like not a planned economy but a highly decentralized system in which citizens are directly involved in taking decisions affecting their lives and enjoy fundamental economic rights as well as political ones Readable yet rigorous Beyond Liberalism brings together political philosophy and political economy to offer a renewed vision of socialism Contradictions Paul
