Armin Kratzer, Gerhard Rainer, Ana Garay, Julieta Krapovickas

Abstract: Rural societies around the world face numerous challenges related to containing market pressures on agro-food production, which is causing a loss of competitiveness of small-scale agriculture. The outlook for the future is unclear for the rural population while an increase in new capitalized actors is visible in the Global North and South. However, there is also a display of resistance and innovative actions by many groups in rural societies. This paper introduces some of the conceptual approaches underlying these development paths. We provide an overview on the problem definitions, goals, means and central actors that are nurturing these alternative economic spaces. In doing so, we seek to bridge some aspects of the North and South, co-creating the world we want.

Introduction

Therefore, rural communities in peripheral areas all over the world are confronted with a particular challenge: The increasing globalization and industrialization of food production and trade provokes a decrease of small-scale agriculture's competitiveness and makes the sustaining of agriculture-based livelihoods an ever more complex process. This does not only have
