

Pelhams can be divided into three types.

Weymouth action

The cheeks go through the mouthpiece and will act laterally. This means that when the reins are used, the cheeks turn out in that direction and help the horse to understand the signal. The Weymouth pelham may be slide mouth. The mouthpiece, sliding up the cheeks before it acts, helps the horse to understand the action of the reins. The horse has a brief warning that the curb is coming into action as the mouth slides up, and he learns to respond.

Fixed cheek pelhams

The cheeks and mouthpieces are fixed. There is no lateral action.

Barbury action pelham

The mouthpiece goes through the cheeks, therefore the cheeks work independently, and there is no lateral action. See also page 42.

Rugby link. These provide the lateral action which is lacking in fixed cheek and Barbury action pelhams. Rugby links are sometimes also found on Weymouth action pelhams.

Fig. 42

Half-moon or Muller mouthed pelham. Designed to take pressure off the horse's tongue. However, this is not a successful piece of equipment, because when the curb rein is used, the mouthpiece turns and presses on the tongue. For this reason, horses do not go well in it.

Fig. 43

Volcanite pelham. A thick, comfortable mouthpiece, this is one of the most widely-used pelhams. It is useful to give more control than a snaffle for hunting and cross country riding, also used on children's ponies.

Fig. 44

Rubber pelham. Comfortable mouthpiece which has a chain running through it as a safety factor. It can be made of hard or soft rubber; how long it lasts will depend on the quality of rubber. The hard rubber generally lasts longer. Similar in its action and use to the volcanite pelham.

Jointed pelham. Has a jointed mouthpiece. A fairly mild pelham; the joint takes pressure off the tongue.

Fig. 45

Arch mouth pelham. The arched mouthpiece makes it suitable for a horse that does not like much tongue pressure or who has had an injury to the tongue.

Fig. 46

Hartwell pelham. Has a small tongue groove to relieve pressure on the tongue.
