The Airspeed AS.12 Horsa glider was a British World War II troop-carrying glider designed by Airspeed Limited and was used by British and Allied forces. British gliders were all bad names starting with H, the name Horsa came from the legendary 5th century conqueror of Southern Britain.

The aircraft was built with a wooden semi-monocoque fuselage built in three sections that were bolted together. The front section consisted of the cockpit and main freight loading door, the main section accommodated up to 18 troops or freight and the rear section supported the tail assembly. The wing had large "Burn Doors" flaps which allowed steep approaches and were actuated by a small air bottle, but could only be deployed once. This allowed the aircraft land in confined spaces. The fusible undercarriage was fixed and could be jettisoned after take off, although if often was not. If jettisoned, the aircraft landed on a spring steel under the fuselage.

The aircraft first flew on 12th September 1942 with a total of 1,650 being built by Airspeed, Austin Motors and furniture manufacturer Morris Lubell.

The Horsa was first used operationally on the night of 16/17th September 1942 on Operation Freshwater, a raid on the German Heavy Water plant in Norway. The next use was on 10th July 1943 on Operation Husky, the invasion of Sicily but the most famous use was during Operation Tonga, the paratrooper operation of 6th July including the capture of Pegasus Bridge. Other operations included Operation Dragoon, the invasion of Southern France, Operation Market Garden, Ardennes and Operation Varsity, the crossing of the Rhine.

The Horsa was towed by a number of different aircraft types, including Albatross, Dakota, Halifax, Stirling and Whitley's.
