People who experience trauma and develop posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) are at increased risk for poor health. One mechanism that could explain this risk is accelerated biological aging, which is associated with the accumulation of chronic diseases, disability, and premature mortality. Using data from 2309 post-9/11 United States military veterans who participated in the VISN 6 MIRECC's Post-Deployment Mental Health Study, we tested whether PTSD and trauma exposure were associated with accelerated rate of biological aging, assessed using a validated DNA methylation (DNAm) measure of epigenetic aging—DunedinPACE. Veterans with current PTSD were aging faster than those who did not have current PTSD, $\beta = 0.18$, 95% CI [0.11, 0.27], $p < .001$. This effect represented an additional 0.4 months of biological aging each year. Veterans were also aging faster if they reported more PTSD symptoms, $\beta = 0.13$, 95% CI [0.09, 0.16], $p < 0.001$, or higher levels of trauma exposure, $\beta = 0.09$, 95% CI [0.05, 0.13], $p < 0.001$. Notably, veterans with past PTSD were aging more slowly than those with current PTSD, $\beta = -0.21$, 95% CI [-0.35, -0.07], $p = .003$. All reported results accounted for age, gender, self-reported race/ethnicity, and education, and remained when controlling for smoking. Our findings suggest that an accelerated rate of biological aging could help explain how PTSD contributes to poor health and highlights the potential benefits of providing efficacious treatment to populations at increased risk of trauma and PTSD.

INTRODUCTION

Posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) is a common [1, 2] and costly [3, 4] mental health disorder that is linked to poorer health [5–7], including greater risk of chronic disease [5, 6], disability [8], and premature death [7]. Despite well-established epidemiological evidence linking PTSD to poor health, it is unclear what explains these health consequences [9–11]. It is critical to determine how PTSD might lead to poorer health to facilitate future interventions that might mitigate the health consequences of PTSD [10]. This is particularly true for populations at greater risk of developing PTSD, such as first responders and military veterans [12–14], who might benefit the most from such interventions.

A number of plausible physiological mechanisms have been theorized to explain the causal pathway from PTSD to poor health. Prior empirical work has shown PTSD can disrupt immune, endocrine, and circulatory system function [9, 15–18], as well as psychosocial mechanisms linked to health, including reduced social support [19, 20] and unhealthy behaviors [21]. Given the breadth of these findings, it is likely that the poor health observed among those with PTSD arise from multiple causes spanning psychosocial, behavioral, and physiological dysregulation. With many plausible mechanistic pathways, there is a need to establish health-relevant biomarkers that can link PTSD to poor health and act as proximal outcomes for interventions studies aiming to reduce the health consequences associated with PTSD.

Accelerated biological aging is a novel mechanism that might help explain how PTSD could result in poor health that manifests across multiple physiological systems [22, 23] and risk for several chronic diseases. Biological aging represents the rate at which people's physiological function declines, which differs among people of the same chronological age. People with accelerated biological aging are theorized to be at risk of poor health across multiple organ systems [24], making assessments of biological aging particularly useful as surrogate clinical outcomes relevant to health [25, 26]. New advances in assessing biological aging using epigenetic DNA methylation measures (DNAm) has enabled more efficient and timely measurement of biological aging [27, 28], particularly third-generation epigenetic measures such as
