

HIV/acquired immune deficiency syndrome stigma, perceived social support, and medical adherence among HIV/acquired immune deficiency syndrome children: A mediation analysis

Varsha Singh, Anupriya, Swaran Lata

Abstract:

The present study brings forward the relationship among HIV/acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) stigma, perceived social support (PSS), and medical adherence found among HIV/AIDS children. A sample of 90 HIV/AIDS-affected children aged 10–18 years from motilal nehru hospital, Allahabad, Uttar Pradesh, India, was selected for the study. Participants were assessed HIV/AIDS stigma, pss, and medical adherence. The tools of descriptive statistics, correlational and regression analysis, and mediation analysis were performed to accomplish the desired objective of the study. Correlational analysis makes it evident that HIV/AIDS stigma is prominently negatively correlated to PSS ($r(88) = -0.670, P < 0.01$) and medical adherence ($r(88) = -0.770, P < 0.01$). Taking into consideration hierarchical regression analysis, it was found that the PSS significantly contributed to 33.2% variance in HIV/AIDS stigma and hiv/aids stigma contributed to 55.7% variance in the process of medical adherence. The achieved results of the mediation analyses validate the mediating role of HIV/AIDS stigma in the association between pss and medical adherence ($\beta = 0.20$, Confidence interval = 0.003 to 0.057, $P = 0.031$). These findings contribute to empirical evidence about psychological predictors and the observable consequences of hiv/aids-related stigma.
