

universities and congregations. As in Theologia, Farley portrays faith as a hermeneutical activity involving the interpretation of life in its various dimensions in relation to God. He defines theology as this interpretive activity carried on in a self-conscious and reflective fashion. It is not the exclusive prerogative of scholars but is open to all persons of faith. Accordingly, theological education should not be seen as confined to clergy education but as taking place in a variety of educational settings, including universities and congregations.

Viewing universities as settings for theological education runs counter to the widespread perception that religion should be taught in such institutions in an objective, nontheological fashion. Farley establishes a place for theology in the university in two ways: first, by expanding the view of critical reason as it is used in this setting to include a role for the imagination, tradition, and ideology; and second, by pointing to the unique place of religion within this richer understanding of reason. If the study of religion has a legitimate place in the university, then it must include an honest encounter with the question of truth as posed by each religion, something which cannot avoid theology. Similarly, establishing congregations as a seat of theological education involves overcoming a number of widespread perceptions to the effect that theology is to be reserved for the scholars and ordained leaders of the church and that church education cannot and should not follow an orderly, formal sequence of learning. In contrast, Farley argues convincingly that ordered learning must take place in congregations if theology is to play a significant role in the contemporary church.

There is much to commend in this book. Farley's attempt to reground theology in the faith of ordinary believers and his call for an educational deepening and disciplining of theological reflection in a variety of settings is a brilliant engagement of some of the most important issues facing the church. How one evaluates his constructive proposals will largely depend upon one's response to the liberal theological tradition, for Farley carries on Schleiermacher's legacy by making contemporary faith his primary point of reference. In my view, this does not adequately engage the most important problem bequeathed by the Reformation to contemporary theology: the postcritical reaffirmation of the authority of the gospel and Scripture as unique sources of theological truth. Theological education which engages this issue may well take place in congregations and universities, but it will not define itself primarily as a disciplining of the interpretive modes of faith, as Farley does in this book.

- Theology and the Justification of Faith: Constructing Theories in Systematic Theology, by WENTZEL VAN HUYSSTEEN. Translated by H. F. SNIJDERS. Wm. B. Eerdmans Publ. Co., Grand Rapids, 1989. 205 pp. $18.95 (paper).

IN THIS BOOK, a rather uninviting title yields a persuasive account of the significance for theology of recent developments in the philosophy of science. Van Huyssteen argues that post-Kuhnian "scientific realism" not only signals a broadening of the concept of rationality but also suggests new ways of conceiving and demonstrating the rationality of theology. It must now be asked of both scientific theories and theological statements: To what extent do they refer, and to what
