Management of constitutional delay of growth and puberty

R STANHOPE AND M A PREECE

Department of Growth and Development, Institute of Child Health, London

Constitutional delay of growth and puberty (CDGP) is not a disease but a common condition in which puberty and its associated growth spurt occur at an age which is near the extreme of the normal range. Growth at puberty is intimately related to the stage of pubertal development and this is why, quite appropriately, both growth and puberty are implicit in the name, although it could be argued that they occur in an incorrect order. It is an important condition to recognise as many such children only need reassurance although some will require, if only for psychological reasons, therapeutic intervention to improve their short term growth. There is much information available about the anthropometric progress of children with constitutional delay of growth and puberty and we have attempted to correlate this with our more recent understanding of possible options for the manipulation of the endocrinology of puberty.

Definition

Constitutional delay of growth and puberty is defined by Prader as: 'constitutional delay of growth occurring in otherwise healthy adolescents with stature reduced for chronological age but generally appropriate for bone age and stage of pubertal development, both of which are usually delayed'.¹

As growth potential is related to the degree of epiphyseal maturation, it is this delay in bone age which permits a final stature within the normal range. It is the 'tempo' of growth (and puberty) which is significantly delayed.² In this article, we shall use the terms 'constitutional delay' and 'growth delay' as synonymous with CDGP as they are almost certainly manifestations of the same condition, although presenting at different ages (see below). CDGP is more common in boys than girls and tends to have a familial pattern. The anthropometric, as well as the psychological, sequelae of delayed puberty are more dramatic in boys on whom we shall concentrate most of our discussion.

Endocrinology of puberty

The initial endocrine event of puberty is high amplitude pulsatile gonadotrophin secretion from the pituitary gland in response to pulsatile gonadotrophin releasing hormone (GnRH) secretion from the hypothalamus.³ These events occur predominantly at night, as does growth hormone secretion. It is interesting that the secretion of these hormones is intimately related to the night during puberty and that this relationship continues throughout reproductive function; the onset of the luteinising hormone surge in women, which is an essential prerequisite to ovulation, occurs in the early hours of the morning. The diurnal secretion of these hormones during early puberty has important implications for their therapeutic administration⁴; oestrogen in girls should be administered in the morning, oral testosterone in boys as well as growth hormone in both sexes are usually given during the evening.

There is a sex difference in the pituitary response to GnRH which may explain the characteristic differences between the timing of the onset of puberty in girls and boys; girls more readily release gonadotrophins to a given GnRH stimulus.⁵ This may explain why the onset of puberty is earlier in girls than boys, why central precocious puberty is more common in girls, and why constitutional delay of growth and puberty is more common in boys.

Although both sex steroids and growth hormone are required for the growth spurt of puberty, the pattern of secretion of sex steroids alone does not explain the growth acceleration of puberty. In girls, oestrogen secretion is at its peak just before menarche, when the growth spurt is waning. In boys, sex steroid secretion increases progressively
