3 and 7, after which the two assemblies are joined together with a turned stretcher, dimensions for which are given in Fig. 6. Holes to receive the 1-in. long tenons of the stretcher are bored in adjacent facing surfaces of the half-lap joint. Care should be taken to prevent the spur of the bit from piercing through the outer face. Set the assembly upright on a level surface and glue the stretcher in place, using a bar clamp as in Fig. 2 to draw the work together tightly.

Dowels are used to attach the arms as shown in Figs. 5 and 7. At the front they enter blind holes, while at the rear they extend completely through the arm and enter the notched end of the back. Apply glue to all surfaces of the joint and clamp crosswise as in Fig. 4. The seat board is supported at the front and back edges with a curved metal strip. The plywood is cut to extend slightly beyond the ends of the strips at which point it is screwed to the legs. The cushion is simply a down-filled pillow covered with fabric.

The beauty of this chair depends a great deal upon the finish. If an open-grained wood has been used, such as walnut, mahogany or oak, the pores must be filled with a prepared paste filler of the proper color. This is mixed to a creamy consistency and applied with a soft-bristled brush, flowing it on with the grain. After it has set for about 15 minutes, the filler is wiped off across the grain so as to leave it packed in the pores. When hard, sand the surface lightly, dust clean and continue with a coat of stain, or 2 coats of high-grade rubbing varnish if a natural finish is desired.
