Blood drives a chance to give back, build morale

BY NANCY KIRSCH | CONTRIBUTING WRITER

Twas the Orlando, Fla., nightclub-mass shootings that inspired Marcy King to arrange a blood drive at Rebuilders Automotive Supply Corp., a national chain she is director, online buying division.

"Last June, my husband [Steven King, vice president and co-owner of the company's Orlando store] and the nightclub attack had happened. ... I started thinking, 'Horrible things like this are happening and not doing anything about it.'" she said.

Immediately upon returning home, Kling contacted the Rhode Island Blood Center to schedule a blood drive at her company. Nearly half of the Coventry-based company's 100 employees donated—a far better response than the 20 percent she'd been told was typical at most drives—and enjoyed breakfast and lunch supplied by the company.

and time stopped as the community's blood supply was threatened by a disaster—such as in Orlando or on 9/11—came not from those who donated in response to the disaster, but from the regular donors. RIBC director of hospital services, “We don’t want [donations] spikes; after spikes come valleys,” said Tompkins, emphasizing RIBC’s need for regular, consistent donations. “We’ve seen university blood drives ceasing or dramatically declining during summer months, businesses across the state closing their doors, and a lull in blood drives then, and year-round.”

RIBC Vice President and Chief Operating Officer Scott J. Asadorian calls education the key to building lifelong donors. When employers allow RIBC:

A REGULAR APPOINTMENT: Anthony Bogar, right, of East Providence, gives blood every eight weeks. Following a recent donation at Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island offices in Providence, he speaks with Scott J. Asadorian, the Rhode Island Blood Center's vice president and chief operating officer.

"Once they're out of the school environment, we have a hard time getting them back [to donate], unless they're in an environment that sponsors drives," Asadorian said. "That's why it's critical for us to grow our sponsorships."

As the primary supplier to 10 of Rhode Island's 12 hospitals and a secondary supplier to many more Blood drives align perfectly with Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island's position as a health care company, said Carolyn Bellise, managing director of community relations. The health insurer averages four or five drives annually, with donations from 5-20 percent of its 300 employees.
