Rice is a staple food for half of the human population, but the effects of diversification on yields, economy, biodiversity and ecosystem services have not been synthesized. Here we quantify diversification effects on environmental and socio-economic aspects of global rice production. We performed a second-order meta-analysis based on 25 first-order meta-analyses covering four decades of research, showing that diversification can maintain soil fertility, nutrient cycling, carbon sequestration and yield. We used three individual first-order meta-analyses based on 39 articles to close major research gaps on the effects of diversification on economy, biodiversity and pest control, showing that agricultural diversification can increase biodiversity by 40%, improve economy by 26% and reduce crop damage by 31%. Trade-off analysis showed that agricultural diversification in rice production promotes win–win scenarios between yield and other ecosystem services in 81% of all cases. Knowledge gaps remain in understanding the spatial and temporal effects of specific diversification practices and trade-offs.

Agricultural production systems face the challenge of producing sufficient food for an increasing human population while reducing agriculture-driven land-use change, biodiversity loss and greenhouse gas emissions¹. A paradigm shift away from chemically intensive systems towards agro-ecological production is increasingly advocated in the international policy arena to safeguard food production and to minimize environmental impacts^{2–4}. Agricultural diversification is a core agro-ecological principle, whereby functional biodiversity is incorporated into cropping systems to regenerate biotic interactions underpinning yield-supporting ecosystem services⁵. Global syntheses show that agricultural diversification practices increase biodiversity and enhance the delivery of several supporting and regulating ecosystem services crucial to crop yield^{6–7}. However, major research gaps in our understanding of diversification benefits remain for specific regions, diversification practices and crops, including rice.

Rice is a staple food for more than half of the global human population and has been cultivated in diversified systems across the world for thousands of years⁸. Sustainability and resilience in global rice production are essential for global food security and consist of the principles and practices that ensure the long-term viability of rice production while benefiting humans and the environment⁹. Individual studies have shown that diversification practices such as genetic varieties, nectar- and pollen-producing plants, and integrated rice–fish farming can increase crop yields, farmers' income and biocontrol and therefore reduce the need for insecticide application^{10–12}. This can help ensure a more reliable and stable food supply and livelihood for farmers,
