Larson, 2012 The paper presents empirical analysis of a panel of countries to estimate an agricultural production function using a measure of capital in agriculture absent from most studies The authors employ a heterogeneous technology framework where implemented technology is chosen jointly with inputs to interpret information obtained in the empirical analysis of panel data The paper discusses the scope for replacing country and time effects by observed variables and the limitations of instrumental variables The empirical results differ from those reported in the literature for cross country studies largely in augmenting the role of capital in combination with productivity gains as a driver of agricultural growth The results indicate that total factor productivity increased at an average rate of 3.2 percent accounting for 59 percent of overall growth Most of the remaining gains stem from large inflows of fixed capital into agriculture The results also suggest possible constraints to fertilizer use The Economics of Agricultural Production Edward Witkowski, Arnold Wells, 1979 Empowerment and agricultural production Wouterse, Fleur Stephanie, 2016-02-19 Niger is a landlocked Sahelian country two thirds of which is in the Sahara desert with only one eighth of the land considered arable Nevertheless more than 90 percent of Niger's labor force is employed in agriculture which is predominantly subsistence oriented Since the great famines of the 1970s and 1980s the country has pursued agrarian intensification through technological change to address challenges to the food security situation However this approach has failed to recognize that the main characteristic of the Sahelian part of West Africa is the intricate complexity of the social environmental and economic dimensions that differentially affect male and female rural dwellers One example is the patrilineal tenure system which under increased population pressure has led to the exclusion of women and youth from agriculture in some areas The Women's Empowerment in Agriculture Index WEAI indicates that access to land is one important dimension of empowerment In order to assess the role of empowerment in agricultural production we use new household and individual level WEAI data from Niger and regression analysis Our results show that empowerment is important for agricultural production and that households in which adult individuals are more empowered are more productive This means that other and possibly more effective pathways to agrarian intensification exist and important agricultural productivity gains could be made by empowering men and women in rural households
