Ethics and AIDS in Africa: The Challenge to our Thinking (Edited by: Anton A van Niekerk, Loretta M Kopelman, South Africa: David Philip Publishers, 2005 - 222 pages, ISBN 0-86492-871-9)

Review

In 2004, bioethicist Michael J. Selgelld described:

Given the magnitude of the AIDS catastrophe in Africa – and given that the causes and consequences of this crisis directly involve issues of justice – it is surprising that, to date, not major books addressing AIDS in Africa have been produced by those who primarily consider themselves to be) bioethicists. As this is one of the most important issues of our time, the lack of bioethics literature is unfortunate and reflects poorly on the discipline of bioethics [1].

Anton A. van Niekerk of the University of Stellenbosch in South Africa and Loretta M. Kopelman of East Carolina University in the United States tackle Selgelld's challenge in their co-edited anthology of articles called, Ethics and AIDS in Africa: The Challenge to Our Thinking [2].

The book is not only about Africa but, importantly, draws heavily on the work of African scholars, which is significant in a field like bioethics that tends to be dominated by academics in North America and Europe. The contributions here and elsewhere from such African scholars as Geoffrey Tangwa, Kyeamantso Moxley and Solomon Berman are required reading for Western ethicists concerned with international issues and Africa in particular.

Bioethics as a discipline tends to bring together scholars from a range of fields; so too does this anthology gather ideas from multiple perspectives including philosophers, economists and public health specialists. The book grew out of a special edition of the Journal of Medicine and Philosophy that was guest edited by van Niekerk and Kopelman in 2002. Approximately half of the articles in the current anthology were originally published in that special edition, which is a testament to the enduring value of their ideas four years later than also puts the editors at risk of becoming outdated which is the case in places.

The chapters cover issues ranging from research ethics to public health ethics to metaphysics, and consider the experiences of not only adults, but also children and infants. Several themes run throughout the book, including the concept of 'Western liberalism' with 'Africa communitarianism', and the related ethical challenge of balancing risks to individuals with benefits to society as a whole. However, no book can do everything; a particular shortcoming in this book is its insufficient treatment of gender which is imperative for analysis of the HIV/AIDS pandemic in Africa.

Most importantly, van Niekerk and Kopelman's anthology provides us with a starting point on which to build a more robust body of scholarship on the ethical dimensions of AIDS in Africa. As noted by Van Niekerk, "HIV/AIDS is the most serious health and social crisis and challenge that has ever befallen Africa" (p. 141). Tangwa further notes,
