

Heritage and Modernity

Contemporary Change in Traditional Societies. JULIAN H. STEWARD, Ed. Vol. 1, Introduction and African Tribes (333 pp., illus. $12.50). Vol. 2, Asian Rural Societies (362 pp., illus. $10). Vol. 3, Mexican and Peruvian Communities (316 pp., illus. $10). University of Illinois Press, Urbana, 1967.

These three volumes edited by Julian H. Steward assemble the results of work carried on under the Studies of Cultural Regularities Project Based at the University of Illinois. They consist essentially of the finished reports of the ten workers who carried out the field studies sponsored by the project during the late '50's and early '60's. The theoretical basis and implications of these studies are to be discussed in a revised version of Steward's Theory of Culture Change. At present, the theoretical part of the study is limited to an introduction, written by Steward. The decision not to include a broader theoretical statement with the field reports seems unfortunate, since it forces the reader to peruse the individual studies without much theoretical aid from the project organizer. The introduction does, however, set forth the ways in which Steward differs fundamentally from others now writing on the subject of modernization. First, he does not use "traditional society" as a blanket term for all societies that are not modern, a usage implicit—for instance—in the works of Gabriel Almond, James Coleman, David Lerner, and Walt Rostow. "Traditional society" is for him merely a base line for the study of relevant changes, "the background of the society that was traditional prior to the penetration of modernizing factors." This approach may entail its own difficulties, since it takes its departure from the description of the set characteristics of a given society, rather than from a model representing the particular dynamics underlying these characteristics. The use of a base line, in other words, somewhat mechanically takes society as a given, rather than as a problem. Yet it does have the great virtue of accentuating the enormous heterogeneity in starting points and in preconditions which is obliterated in the more abstract approaches of nonanthropologists. Political scientists, sociologists, and economists seem to have taken to the concept of "traditional society" much as they earlier took to the concept of the folk society, largely because it allows them to substitute a generalized conceptual model for the heterogeneous reality from which it was constructed. Unfortunately, reality is frequently more protean than is allowed for in the conceptual apparatus.

Closely related to Steward's use of "traditional society" as a heuristic artifice of the investigator is his insistence on the investigation of cases in which modernizing tendencies have been at work. His aim is to account for "the specific alterations of particular societies." These, he says, "may or may not be cross-culturally similar." Whereas many investigators assume that modernization is everywhere producing the same homogeneous type from a heterogeneous reality, Steward argues that "special combinations of processes of cultural change together with differences in the cultural heritages and in local environmental and social adaptations will perpetuate a varied cultural topography." He is greatly interested in convergences and parallelisms, worldwide or between particular societies or subsystems of societies; the intent is nomothetic. The thrust of his presentation, however—and of those of the contributors to these volumes—is toward the idiographic, toward giving adequate explanations of particular cases before making a model to stand for them. Here Steward and his collaborators are working within an anthropological tradition which cleaves to the notion that macroscopic changes are not automatically duplicated in microscopic changes of the same kind. "A major task," writes Steward, "is to assess the significance of the heritage of cultural areas so that cross-cultural operations of similar modernizing factors within different settings can be recognized."

The choice of cases to be presented in these volumes was made with "two very crude categories" in mind. The studies deal, first of all, with native tribal societies; they then proceed to investigate the rural segments of states. The tribal societies include the Kayah of Burma, the Anaguta of Nigeria, the Kipsigis of Kenya, the Kaguru of Tanzania, and the Yaquis and the Mayo of Mexico. The rural segments of states studied comprise rubber-growers in Malaya, peasants in Japan, and workers on large estates on the coast and in the highlands of Peru. The volumes themselves, however, are organized on a geographical basis. Volume 1 deals with African tribes; volume 2 discusses rural societies in Asia; volume 3 presents findings on Mexican and Peruvian communities.

A Stable, a Changed, and a Dying Tribe

Edward H. Winter and T. O. Beidelman open volume 1 with a discussion of the Kaguru of mountainous east central Tanganyika, the largest of the tribes in Kilosa district. They first trace the operations of colonial institutions established by the British after their seizure of the territory following World War I. Especially interesting is the discussion of the rationale for indirect rule. Winter and Beidelman then trace the working out of these institutions on the local level. The Kaguru do not work as laborers on the foreign-owned sisal estates established on land too dry for African farming, but grow maize for sale to feed the estate laborers or to sell to Asian Indian traders whose commercial network is fortified through widely ramifying ties of kinship and friendship. Land is not a commodity, but is held by locally dominant clans and allocated to individuals by the local clan leader. Affiliation with local clan groups and good relations with clan members thus remain important, since they are necessary for access to land. The same is true of relations within the local matrilineages: the Kaguru continue to rely on them for aid in raising bride wealth and emergency funds, as well as in legal cases. These structural alignments tend to counteract tendencies toward greater independence on the part of individual nuclear families. The authors conclude that "what is striking is that no fundamentally new types of social Socialising Complexity Sheila Kohring, Stephanie Wynne-Jones, 2007-11-30 Socialising Complexity introduces the concept of complexity as a tool rather than a category for understanding social formations. This new take on complexity moves beyond the traditional concern with what constitutes a complex society and focuses on the complexity inherent in various social forms through the structuring principles created within each society. The aims and themes of the book can thus be summarized as follows: to introduce the idea of complexity as a tool which is pertinent to the understanding of all types of society rather than an exclusionary type of society in its own right; to examine concepts that can enhance our interpretation of societal complexity such as heterarchy, materialization and contextualization. These concepts are applied at different scales and in different ways illustrating their utility in a variety of different cases to reestablish social structure as a topic of study within archaeology which can be profitably studied by proponents of both processual and post processual methodologies.
