

Basic Concepts in Social Case Work

Gordon Hamilton

WHEN we think of fundamental concepts we are inclined to imagine a static practice. The truth is that case work concepts are dynamic—they change, grow, and develop as they are shaped by new experience and new knowledge. While knowledge itself is important as giving us information, what we are trying to gain is understanding derived from knowledge and, in turn, derived from actual experience. The central ideas in case work have undergone a long evolution and are still changing. Each change affects our concepts of treatment.

Case work has always concerned itself with human needs. People require material things and to the social conscience of the western world subsistence needs have at last taken on the character of elementary justice or social obligation. People need also experiences that bring satisfactions, and when they cannot manage these experiences or arrange their activities in a way to bring them such satisfactions as men live by, they may be the concern of social workers.

Case work developed in the matrix of charity, that is to say—it was associated chiefly with relief giving and the care of the sick. It is, and always has been, oriented to needs—material, social, personal, and spiritual. Its great concepts involve, as they have always done, love of one's neighbor, sharing one another's burdens, and helping people to help themselves.

Because the humanitarian movement had so much identification with economic privilege, and relief is so easily allied with power or patronage, critics of case work ideology would tend to substitute the concept of rights for the concept of needs, as if the two were opposed. We should not be misled by this. Human needs are no less important because we are clearer and more determined about the establishing of human rights.

Human rights imply definition, classification, and common treatment; human needs imply individualization within the broader classifications and differential treatment. The case work idea is now, however, fortunately no longer circumscribed by the practices of relief giving, but may be utilized whenever people lack capacity to organize the ordinary affairs of life or lack satisfactions in their ordinary social relationships. Anxiety, distress, and incapacity are always personal and must be so understood.

I SHOULD place as central in our discussion the understanding that problems are both individual and social; that a case is for us always a complex of inner and outer factors. We know that there are unmanageable factors in the environment and that no case work approach will make them more manageable. Broad scale environmental reorganization alone will bring them to terms. On the other hand, the typical case situation is that of a person in conflict with environmental factors, or with a deficiency which must be compensated for by community resources; or again, the case work situation is one in which the conflict has been to some degree internalized so that the client is in some conflict with himself as well as with society. Even if the last were not often true, we should still have to face the fact that causal relations in social work are extremely complex, so that any understanding of the individual in a social setting is difficult and calls for steady growth in diagnostic ability by the practitioner.

The idea that we are concerned with social reality and social adjustments is fundamental, although our sense of social and individual conflicts changes and indeed has, within the last years, been changing with considerable rapidity. Society is inseparable
