This authors' goal is to provide a conceptual framework for developing a therapeutic community which includes the understanding of motivation, and further expands on institutional and nursing care. It is our hope that readers will have had some previous ideas from previous or other authors, administrators, community workers, and family organizations that they believe are necessary to a therapeutic community in the therapeutic. This book is a distillation of their experience at the Pillsbury Hospital and at several other medical centers for mental hospital care.

The ideas in this book have been adapted from the disciplines of psychology, sociology, anthropology and geriatrics, medicine, education, law, social science, family therapy, group therapy, and nursing care. These adaptations allow the use of new conceptual methods which have been used by various disciplines previously believed to be mutually incompatible. The authors feel that these methods could be adapted to other fields in the hospital and treatment of nursing homes, leading to better patient care.
