

friends, Frodo. Anyway: there it is. We know most of what has told you. We know a good deal about the Ring. We are afraid—but we are coming with you; or following you like horses. 'And after all, sir,' added Sam, 'you did ought to take the advice. Gildor said you should take them as was willing, and not deny it.'

'I don't deny it,' said Frodo, looking at Sam, who was grinning. 'I don't deny it, but I'll never believe you are again, whether you snore or not. I shall kick you hard to be sure.'

'You are a set of deceitful scoundrels!' he said, turning to them. 'But bless you!' he laughed, getting up and waving his arms. 'I will take Gildor's advice. If the danger were not so dark, I should dance for joy. Even so, I cannot help feeling happy: happy I have felt for a long time. I had dreaded this evening.'

'Good! That's settled. Three cheers for Captain Frodo and his party!' they shouted; and they danced round him. Merry and Pippin began a song, which they had apparently got ready for the occasion. It was made on the model of the dwarf-song that named his adventure long ago, and went to the same tune:

*Farewell we call to hearth and hall!
Though wind may blow and rain may fall,
We must away ere break of day
Far over wood and mountain tall.*

*To Rivendell, where Elves yet dwell
In glades beneath the misty fell,
Through moor and waste we ride in haste,
And whither then we cannot tell.*

*With loes ahead, behind us dread,
Beneath the sky shall be our bed,
Until at last our toil be passed,
Our journey done, our errand sped.*

*We must away! We must away!
We ride before the break of day!*

'Very good!' said Frodo. 'But in that case there are a few things to do before we go to bed—under a roof, for tonight at any rate.'

'I don't altogether. But I understand that Gandalf chose me a good companion. I am content. We will go together.'

Frodo finished his breakfast in silence. Then standing up he looked over the land ahead, and called to Pippin.

'All ready to start?' he said as Pippin ran up. 'We must be getting off at once. We slept late; and there are a good many miles to go.'

'You slept late, you mean,' said Pippin. 'I was up long before; and we are only waiting for you to finish eating and thinking.'

'I have finished both now. And I am going to make for Bucklebury Ferry as quickly as possible. I am not going out of the way, back to the road we left last night: I am going to cut straight across country from here.'

'Then you are going to fly,' said Pippin. 'You won't cut straight on that anywhere in this country.'

'We can cut straighter than the road anyway,' answered Frodo. 'The Ferry is east from Woodhall; but the hard road curves away to the left—you can see a bend of it away north over there. It goes round the north end of the Marsh so as to strike the causeway from the bridge above Stock. But that is miles out of the way. We could save a quarter of the distance if we made a line for the Ferry from where we stand.'

'Short cuts make long delays,' argued Pippin. 'The country is rough round here, and there are bogs and all kinds of difficulties down in the Marsh—I know the land in these parts. And if you are worrying about Black Riders, I can't see that it is any worse meeting them on a road than in a wood or a field.'

'It is less easy to find people in the woods and fields,' answered Frodo. 'And if you are supposed to be on the road, there is some chance that you will be looked for on the road and not off it.'

'All right!' said Pippin. 'I will follow you into every bog and ditch, but it is hard: I had counted on passing the Golden Perch at Stock before sundown. The best beer in the Eastfarthing, or used to be: it was long time since I tasted it.'

'That settles it!' said Frodo. 'Short cuts make delays, but inns make longer ones. At all costs we must keep you away from the Golden Perch. We want to get to Bucklebury before dark. What do you say, Sam?'

'I will go along with you, Mr. Frodo,' said Sam (in spite of private nagging and a deep regret for the best beer in the Eastfarthing). 'Then if we are going to toil through bog and ditch, I will go with you.'
