Crafting Cultural Rhetorics Readings For University Writers 3rd Ed:

Readings in Writing Courses Richard C. Raymond, 2010-12-01 As the title suggests this six chapter book responds to a question which in Western culture goes back to Plato Aristotle Cicero and Quintilian namely What should rhetoric teachers ask their students to read Primarily historical the first two chapters trace conflicting answers to the question above focusing on two constructive results of the debate the re invention of rhetoric and writing as a discipline a coherent and growing body of knowledge and as a result the emergence of independent departments of writing free from departments of English free therefore to develop their own curriculum and to manage their own budgets Additionally the second chapter examines two destructive consequences of this debate the ban of literature from writing courses where students might profitably study both and as a result the often painful departmental splits which not only separate former colleagues but also cramp the pedagogy of those trained to teach both writing and literature More than a survey of key publications this chapter encourages readers to honor the discipline of rhetoric but to make a place for literature on their composition syllabi The next four chapters provide pedagogical support for these chief claims that literature can and should be taught in writing courses and that such readings need not distract students from the primary text their own writing On the contrary these readings motivate serious writing when students feel invited into a conversation on issues that touch their lives These pedagogical chapters then move entering professionals from the theoretical debate to the application of theory therefore the book would serve well professors of courses in composition theory particularly those who enjoy teaching the conflicts and preparing their graduate students to design assignments and courses that apply theories of learning reading and composing Recording

Readings of Disciplinarity Benjamin Miller brings a big data approach to the study of disciplinarity in rhetoric composition and writing studies RCWS by developing scalable maps of the methods and topics of several thousand RCWS dissertations from 2001 to 2015 Combining charts and figures with engaging and even playful prose Miller offers an accessible model of how large scale data driven research can advance disciplinary understanding both answering and amplifying the call to add replicable data analysis and visualization to the mix of methods regularly employed in the field Writing studies has long been marked by a multitude of methods and interlocking purposes partaking of not just humanities approaches but also social scientific ones with data drawn from interviews and surveys alongside historical and philosophical arguments and with corpus analytics in large scale collections jostling against small scale case studies of individuals These areas of study aren't always cleanly separable shifting modes mark the discipline as open and welcoming to many different angles of research The field needs to embrace that vantage point and generate new degrees of familiarity with methods beyond those of any individual scholar Not only a training genre and not only a knowledge making genre the dissertation is also a discipline producing genre Illustrating what the field has been studying and how Distant Readings of Disciplinarity supports more fruitful collaborations within and across research areas and methods
