Smart Ageing in Urban China Yi Yu, 2025-09-26 This book provides an in depth study of community and home eldercare in modern China examining its integration with urban community governance. Community eldercare established through public private partnerships reveals a hybrid economy where state control and marketization coexist. By situating eldercare within the community it becomes intertwined with population governance particularly with the recent adoption of smart care technologies. As a result community eldercare transforms into a semi public space that combines elements of social physical and emotional homes for older adults. The book explores caregivers work framing it as bodily dirty and emotional labor. In the current trend of digitalization caregivers are not only monitored by digital technologies but are also required to interact with these technologies in addition to providing direct care. Drawing on ethnographic analysis this book is an invaluable resource for students and scholars in human geography gerontology and Asian studies as well as for policymakers and practitioners in the rapidly expanding field of eldercare. It will also resonate with a broader audience interested in the global implications of population aging and the integration of technology in care systems.
