Abstract: Trade is an important means to achieve the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) Target 2.1 “Zero Hunger”, and comparative advantage can be used to explain the causes and performance of trade. This study measures the static distribution of agricultural trade comparative advantage in countries along the Belt and Road (B&R) and China by utilizing the Balassa revealed comparative advantage (RCA) index, and further calculates its dynamic change by utilizing the revealed symmetric comparative advantage (RSCA) index and the ordinary least squares correlation analysis. The results show that: (1) in the face of multiple unfavorable factors, the initial comparative advantage of most agricultural products at Harmonized System (HS) 2-digit level in countries along the B&R and China deteriorated, simultaneously; but the initial comparative disadvantage of most and some agricultural products at HS 2-digit level in countries along the B&R and China improved, respectively; (2) the present agricultural trade comparative advantage in most countries along the B&R was higher than China and had a larger extent of change, but the current product structure of their bilateral agricultural trade was in line with each other's comparative advantage, indirectly proving the validity of the Heckscher–Ohlin theorem. Our research findings suggest that the agricultural trade comparative advantage in countries along the B&R and China need to be further utilized to improve agricultural trade performance and better play its important role in ensuring global, regional, and national food security.

1. Introduction

The challenges to ending hunger, food insecurity, and all forms of malnutrition have kept growing in recent years [1], especially the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic outbreak in early 2020 and the ongoing war in Ukraine outbreak in February 2022, both of which have triggered new crises in global agri-food systems on top of existing challenges, such as climate change, economic slowdowns and food loss and waste that are already undermining the global community's effort of achieving the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) Target 2.1 “Zero Hunger” adopted by all the United Nations (UN) member states in 2015 [2]. It is estimated that between 702 and 828 million people around the world were affected by hunger in 2021, which has grown by about 150 million since the outbreak of the COVID-19 pandemic [1].

Given that trade can move food from where it can be produced at a relatively low cost to where it is needed and contribute to building a better world free of hunger, the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development of the UN recognized trade as an important means to achieve the “Zero Hunger” target [3]. The global trade in food and agricultural products has more than doubled in volume and calories since 1995 [3]. While all economies have strengthened their participation in the global food and agricultural market, emerging
