

Agriculture, WTO, Trade Liberalisation, and Food Security Challenges in the Developing Countries

BY KALIM SIDDIQUI

The agriculture sector plays a historic and integral role in the socioeconomic development of the country – it has a significant contribution to the per-capita income of both industrialised and developing nations and has helped in shaping the early civilisation to progression. This article will trace how the policy and reform challenges in agricultural development have helped in restructuring the economic fabrics of the society, and why food security is a crucial contributing factor in the growth of both the regional and international economies.

I will discuss herein the impact of trade liberalisation (i.e., free trade) on the agricultural sector and also food security in the developing countries. The WTO (World Trade Organisation) entered into force in 1995 as the most powerful multi-lateral institution worldwide, not least because of bringing free trade into agriculture and its dispute settlement mechanism. It is understood that if a country, after for instance struggling with its internal finances, secures a bail-out from the IMF (International Monetary Fund), its obligations cease when it has repaid its loan in full, whereas once a country joins the WTO, in contrast, it will be locked into the organisation in perpetuity.

The WTO's negotiations at Doha in 2001 were fundamentally flawed, as they were clearly designed to protect the interests of big corporations, especially those linked to agricultural commodities and based in the developed countries, while conferring very little benefit to farmers in the developing countries. Therefore, at the next WTO ministerial meeting, which is scheduled for June 2020 in Kazakhstan, it is important that developing countries propose reform within the WTO in order to protect their agricultural and industrial sectors and indeed their general interests.

The WTO's trade liberalisation policy draws its theoretical support from David Ricardo's ideas of 'comparative advantage' and 'free market' in order to achieve efficiency and cost reduction.¹ 'Market' as a term, generally refers to a competitive environment and competition, but under capitalism it does not always mean this. Implications for UK Agriculture and EU Agricultural Policy of Trade Liberalisation and the Wto Round Great Britain. Parliament. House of Commons. Agriculture Committee, Griculture Committee, 2000 The liberalisation of trade in agricultural products regulated through the World Trade Organisation is having a profound effect on the UK agricultural industry and on EU agricultural policy The Committee believes that the WTO should not be transformed into a universal reform league if that puts at risk its ability to sustain its primary purpose as a rules based regulator of world trade agreements The best way to assist small farms in the UK which find themselves under threat is through reform of the Common Agricultural Policy CAP and a gradual shift away from distorting production subsidies to a policy based on clear objectives for environmental protection and rural development

Trade Liberalization in China's Accession to the World Trade Organization Elena Ianchovichina, Will Martin, 2001 China's forthcoming access to the World Trade Organization involves reform in many sectors both domestic and trade related The starting point for reform is a partially reformed economy with relatively high import duties in which export sectors benefit from liberal duty exemptions on inputs Both China and its major trading partners will gain from access with China gaining most perhaps half of the estimated 56 billion in annual welfare gains Some developing countries will suffer small losses because of increased competition from China The adjustments required are greatly reduced by China's dramatic liberalization in the 1990s
