

ADOLESCENT PSYCHOLOGY- Adolescents in the US today

- The developmental tasks for today's adolescents are no different than from 50 years ago
- For most youth, adolescence isn't a time to rebel, time for crisis, pathology or deviance
- Rather, it is a time for evolution, to make decisions, to commit, and find a place in the world
- Most adolescence successfully negotiate the path to adult maturity, but a lot still don't
- Social contexts influence adolescent development
- Contexts are settings that are influenced by historical, economic, social, and cultural factors where development occurs
 - Family, peers, school, Religion, neighborhood, community, region, and nation each with its cultural legacies
- The cultural context for the US is changing with an increase in the number of adolescents immigrating from Latino and Asian countries
- More research is needed to include the ethnically diverse population and its effects in adolescence
- Social policy is the course of action designed by the national government to influence the welfare of its citizens
 - Researchers argue that the US has a fragmented social policy for youth that too often focuses only on negative developmental deficits and not enough positive approaches
 - Research indicates that youth benefit when they have caring adults in their lives along with parents and guardians
