Holloway,1967 The problem of return from a circular orbit at an altitude of 150 nautical miles of land recovery sites is treated from two viewpoints First the recall capability for return of several classes of entry vehicles with lateral range capabilities of 210 to 3000 nautical miles to three sites located in the American quadrant of the Northern Hemisphere is defined The effect of the addition of one optimally located emergency site to a network of three prime sites is also determined It is shown that a capability of return to the continental United States once per orbit will require a vehicle with a lateral range capability of about 3000 nautical miles a lift drag ratio L D of approximately 2.4 The addition of one optimally located emergency site reduces this quick return lateral range requirement to 1000 to 1500 nautical miles L D 1.25 to 1.6 Second the minimum number of recovery sites necessary to support return to earth once per orbit quick return are defined for vehicle lateral range capabilities of 270 to 3000 nautical miles orbital inclinations of 30 45 60 75 90 and all orbital inclinations in the range of 30 to 90 and recovery sites with existing runways at least 8000 feet in length at which military and or civilian aircraft of the United States are currently permitted to land It is shown that only small reductions in the number of required sites in a minimum site recovery network for return from a given orbit with an inclination in the range of 30 to 90 can be obtained by increasing the lateral range capability of the vehicle beyond the following values a 1000 nautical miles L D 1.25 for prime recovery network b 2000 nautical miles L D 1.8 for prime plus weather alternate recovery networks c 2500 to 3000 nautical miles L D 2.2 to 2.4 for prime plus daylight alternate recovery networks It is also shown that a single recovery network of two to seven sites depending on weather or daylight requirements will support quick return from all orbits with an inclination in the range of 30 to 90 for an entry vehicle with a lateral range capability of 2500 to 3000 nautical miles L D 2.2 to 2.4 Finally the return of spacecraft with a vertical landing capability to large recovery areas is considered It is shown that large recovery areas allow only small reductions in lateral range requirements when compared with the careful selection of a few point recovery sites
